The Problem

A retail bank receives a massive stream of incoming credit card transactions. The system must evaluate each transaction against historical spending rules and sliding-window statistics (e.g., "Has this card been used in three different cities in the last 10 minutes?"). GeeksforGeeks

Using high-level interpreted languages or naive search loops on millions of records creates severe performance bottlenecks and memory overhead.